Historic short stories about Oregon's famous ghost town, Shaniko. Fun & informational "corner".
~ Submitted by Debra Holbrook

1920s Blacksmithing

In Shaniko Remembered by Robert Altermatt, he spent time exploring all there was to find in Shaniko in 1925-35. His recollections as a boy there are astounding when he wrote and published in 2000.

The blacksmith shop he frequented was operated by Herman Sandman. It was the first building on the right as you came into town from the west. The building wasn't well ventilated. Inside Robert describes that equipment such as a hand cranked centrifugal blower, billows were outdated. "Specialized machines" Herman used to form wagon tires, which are the metal rings that encircled the wooden wagon wheel. There is a primitive "specialized" tool to do that just outside the newspaper office in Shaniko Row where the Sage saloon and museum are. There was a hand powered drill press also. Herman was also a farrier and usually shod saddle horses and an occasional work horse team. In young Robert's eyes Herman was the strongest man in the world, "blacksmithing makes you that way. Or it kills you."

Beware of Shapeshifters

The vibrating bass of the sound system is a little too much for Asher, who decides to retreat upstairs for some quiet. No one at the party will miss me, he reasons with an eye roll. He was barely invited to the Senior's Spooky Halloween Bash, anyway. He wouldn't be here if he hadn't scored a last-minute invitation from his lab partner and crush, Trisha.

Asher doesn't really care about the party itself. He just wants to spend some time outside of school with Trisha. As a bonus, he'll have a chance to see the inside of the haunted Shapeshifters Tavern where the party is being thrown.

Unfortunately, most of the rooms are locked and blocked off with caution tape, so there isn't much to see. Asher still tries every door as he strolls down the hallway on the second floor. To his surprise, one creaks open. It's an old bedroom complete with a dresser, chest, vanity, and four-poster bed frame.

And there, lying in the center of the bed, is Trisha. Her face is pale, and she's clutching her stomach. Asher drops to his knees at the side of the bed and reaches for her. "What's wrong? What happened?" he asks eagerly.

Her response is so quiet it's barely audible. "I didn't feel good, so I came up here to lie down." Asher's blood runs cold as Trisha begins violently coughing and produces handfuls of bright red liquid. Blood. He has to do something.

Asher scoops up her limp body and rushes out of the room to find help, but as soon as he reaches the hallway, the weight of her body vanishes. Trisha is gone. Through the tears, Asher looks down at his arms in disbelief. But he can't ponder for too long, because he hears a sound to his left that makes his jaw drop.

"Hey Ash, you OK?" Trisha asks as she walks up the stairs with a small smile.

"You look like you've just seen a ghost."
